Reduction in innervation and release of norepinephrine in rat brain by treatment of diabetes mellitus with insulin. The effect of treatment of rats with streptozotocin-induced diabetes with insulin on the innervation density and tissue levels of norepinephrine (NE) was investigated in various regions of the rat brain. Forty-two adult male Sprague-Dawley rats were divided into two equal groups. The first group received an injection of streptozotocin (STZ) to induce diabetes and another group received an injection of citrate buffer. Rats in the two groups were treated with insulin for 30 days. After treatment, blood glucose levels of the insulin-treated diabetic rats were found to be lower than that of the STZ-treated rats. Diabetic rats treated with insulin had a significantly lower body weight than rats in the other group. Compared with rats treated with citrate buffer, the innervation density of the locus coeruleus (LC) was significantly higher in rats treated with insulin. The tissue levels of NE in the hippocampus, frontal cortex, amygdala, and hypothalamus were significantly reduced in diabetic rats treated with insulin compared to that of normal control rats. The tissue levels of NE in the hippocampus, frontal cortex, amygdala, and hypothalamus were significantly reduced in diabetic rats treated with insulin compared to that of normal control rats.
